

Dear FCC Chairman Ajit Pai,

It has come to my attention that you are voting to remove the current FCC Net Neutrality regulations. I believe that this is an incorrect move. Loosening the current laws put into plays would only restrict a service that has become so important in many people's lives. Small business would be able to be shut up by big cable companies, with no way to fight against it because of the lack of NN laws. Government agencies are supposed to do their job and make decisions based on the needs of the people. Well, the people have participated in votes and studies on the matter, and over 90% of them are in favor of keeping the Net Neutrality laws as they are currently. Changing laws that people prefer as they are does not seem like a consumer-friendly, for-the-people move. It is also worth noting that changing the laws would have repercussions in foreign countries, which could attract bad publicity for our country as a whole. A majority of websites are hosted in the US. If the cable companies were allowed to throttle these sites, they would also be throttled in places like Britain. Do you want this kind of negative publicity affecting our image?

For these reason, I encourage the FCC to re-consider their stance and keep the NN laws as strong as they are currently.

Sincerely,

Patrick G.
